

Market analysis

After the global economy started strongly against expectations in 2024, driven mainly by the US economy, this positive trend has now softened to some extent. The US economy has been growing at 1.4% annualised since the first quarter, but is still nevertheless a long way from a possible recession despite this cooling. The eurozone, which was still close to a recession in the two quarters before the turn of the year, seems to be gradually emerging from a period of economic stagnation. A slight increase in economic growth is visible, with the southern eurozone countries being the main driving force. In China, expectations were low, leaving room for positive surprises. In the first quarter, the Chinese economy managed to grow faster than the 5% target, thanks in part to an accommodative fiscal government policy.

For the time to come, the most plausible scenario appears to be that the US economy will continue to outperform the European economy in absolute terms. For example, the IMF expects economic growth of around 0.9% for the eurozone and 2.1% for the US for the whole of 2024. However, the IMF expects a further convergence of both regions towards economic growth of 1.7% in 2025. This therefore suggests that the US will see slower growth compared to 2023. So far, the US economy has proved to be more robust than expected, but the lagged effects of tighter monetary policy, the gradual weakening of fiscal policy, and a weakening of the labour market are still expected to weigh on overall demand.

This last development has been visible in the US for some time. Since the low of 3.4% in April 2023, the unemployment rate has already risen to 4.0%. As a result, the labour market is under somewhat less pressure, although even by US standards, it remains very tight. The Congressional Budget Office (CBO) and Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis estimates the current natural unemployment rate (the level at which inflation remains stable) at 4.2%. As a result, we can expect some upward pressure on wages and prices in the period ahead, but the difference has since been fairly normalised.

This normalisation is also visible in what are known as the sentiment indicators, all of which are now around an average level. This does not unequivocally indicate an expected expansion or contraction of the US economy and is therefore in line with the expectations outlined by the IMF.

Finally, Americans will go to the polls in November for the presidential election. Without anticipating the outcome, political elections can lead to short-sighted and inefficient public investment to bind voters, and the run-up to the election may impact consumer and business confidence in the US.

After a strong start for global equities in the first quarter, the second quarter was less convincing. While global equities posted positive figures, there were also regions that ended the quarter with a loss. European bonds underperformed in the second quarter, and investment-grade corporate bonds performed slightly better during the quarter. European listed real estate proved volatile and ended the quarter with a loss, although this was smaller than that of European equities.

Fund strategy and results

After a strong first quarter of 2024, the second quarter also ended with positive figures for the ASR Pensioen Mixfondsen. The slight net increase in economic growth figures confirms the moderate macro expectations of investors, with a bright spot here and there. We see this reflected on the global stock exchanges with a new 'all time high' for several stock market indices, although we note differences per region and per sector. Inflation has clearly decreased and is still persistent, so that the bond markets have once again revised downwards their expectations for the pace of possible interest rate cuts by central banks. As a result, the interest rate on the capital market rose slightly, which is reflected in price pressure for fixed-income securities, especially for government bonds. European listed real estate naturally suffered from this interest rate increase and lagged slightly behind the average return on the European stock exchanges.

The slight increase in interest rates on the capital market is reflected in price pressure for fixed-income securities, for example the return on Euro government bonds in this period came to more than 1% negative. The Euro corporate bonds Investment Grade just managed to keep their heads above water thanks to the interest payments, on balance this category recorded a minimal plus over the second quarter. In line with this, the Euro corporate bonds in the High Yield category (with higher interest payments) recorded a slightly better return, which was over 1%. Corporate bonds in USD High Yield performed slightly better with a return of around 1.8%, partly due to the increase in value of the US Dollar against the Euro. The bonds of Emerging countries also benefited from the slightly higher USD rate but were also affected by the increase in interest rates, so that on balance this category recorded a higher return of over 1%. The mortgage loans recorded a small plus in this quarter despite the increase in interest rates on the capital market, which was only partly passed on in the mortgage rates. Once again, US shares performed better than European shares measured in euros, partly helped by the stronger US Dollar, here we recorded returns of 4.7% and 1.3% respectively in this period. The Asia/Pacific region disappointed with a decline of 1.1%, emerging markets recorded the best result with a price increase of over 6%, mainly due to positive figures from China. European listed real estate continued the upward trend in April and May, in line with the European stock exchanges. However, sentiment turned in June, so that the second quarter ended with a loss of over 0.5% for this category.

We see these developments on the financial markets reflected in the realised returns of the ASR Pensioen Mixfondsen over the second quarter of 2024, where we note increases of 1.80% for the defensive profile, 2.09% in the neutral profile and 2.34% in the offensive profile respectively. The implementation of the tactical vision has contributed a few basis points negatively to the achieved fund result this quarter, in particular this concerns the underweighting in US shares and in shares of Emerging countries versus the overweighting in European shares. In addition, we saw a clear negative contribution to the result of the ASR Pension Mix Funds compared to the benchmark due to the selection of companies in the ASR Worldwide Impact Shares Fund. The largest negative contributions in this fund were due to price declines of Alfen (energy storage and charging stations) and SolarEdge (energy systems). This impact strategy was added to the ASR Pension Mix Funds in the course of the second quarter with a focus on sustainable business models, which we expect to perform above average in the longer term. On balance, we note an underperformance for the Mix Funds of the a.s.r. Employee Pension this quarter. After deduction of fund costs, a relative performance compared to the associated benchmarks of -0.57% remains for the Defensive mix fund, -0.61% for Neutral and -0.66% for Offensive.

Outlook

For the second quarter of 2024, we opted for a slightly overweight position in listed real estate versus a slightly underweight position in corporate bonds. During the quarter, we took our overweight position in listed real estate and our underweight position in corporate bonds to neutral. This was mainly due to the fact that listed real estate had caught up, as a result of which we had already used most of the potential. For the third quarter of 2024, we choose to keep the tactical vision neutral.
